At breakfast, Mr. Coventry invited Miss Carden to go to the top of Cairnbope Peak, and look over four counties. He also told her she could see Bollinghope House, his own place, very well from the Peak.

Grace assented: and, immediately after breakfast, begged Jael to be in the way to accompany her. She divined, with feminine quickness, that Mr. Coventry would be very spt, if he pointed out Bollinghope to her from the top of a mountain, to say, 'Will you be its mistress?' but, possibly she did not wish to be hurried, or it may have been only mere instinct, an irrational impulse of self-defence, with which the judgment had nothing to do; or perhaps it was simple modesty. Any way, she engaged Jael to be of the party.

It was talked of ggain at luncheon.

the judgment had nothing to do; or perhaps it was simple modesty. Any way, she engaged Jael to be of the party.

It was talked of again at luncheon, and then Mr. Raby put in a word, 'I have one atjuiction to make, young people, and that is you go up the east side, and down the same way. It is all safe walking on that side. I shall send you in my four-wheel to the foot of the hill, and George will wait for you there at the 'Colity Dog' public house, and bring you home again.'

This was, of course, accepted with thanks, and the four-wheel came round at two o'clock. Jael was saated in front by the side of George, who drove; Mr. Coveniry and Grace behind. He had his fur cloak to keep his companion warm on returning from the hill; but Mr. Raby, who did nothing by halves, threw in some more wraps, and gave a warm one to Jael; she was a favorite with him, as indeed were all the Dences. They started gaily, and rattled off at a good pace. Before they had got many yards on the high-road, they passed a fir plantation, belonging ito Mr. Raby, and a magple fluttered out of this, and flew across the road before them.

Jael selzed the reins, and pulled them so powerfully, she stopped the pony directly. 'Oh, the foul bird!' she cried, 'turn back! turn back!' what for?' inquired Mr. Coveniry. 'We shall mee: with trouble else. One magple! and right athwart us, too,' 'what nonsense!' said Grace.

'Nay, nay, it is not; Squire knows better. Wait just one minute, till I speak to Squire.' She sprang from the carriage with one bound, and, holding up her dress with one hand, ran into the house like a lapwing.

'The good, kind, silly thing!' said Grace Carden.

Jael soon found Mr. Raby, and told him about the magple, and begged him the house like a lapwing.

'The good, kind, silly thing!' said Grace Carden.

Jael soon found Mr. Raby, and told him about the mapple, and begged him to come out and order them back.

But Mr. Raby smiled, and shook his head. 'That won't do. Young ladies and gentlemen of the present day don't believe in omens.'

'But by ou do,know better, sir. I have heard father say you were going into Hillsborough with him one day, and a mapple flew across, and father persuaded you to turn back.'

'That is true; he was going in to buy some merino sheep, and I to deposit my rents in Carrington's bank. Next day the bank broke. And the merino sheep all died within the year. But how many thousand times does a magple cross us and nothing come of it? Come, run away, my good girl, and don't keep them waiting.'

Jael obeyed, with a sigh. She went back to her party—they were gone. The carriage was just disappearing round a turn in the road. She looked at it with amazement, and even with anger. It seemed to her a brazan act of bad faith.

anger. It seemed to her a brazen act of bad faith.

'I wouldn't have believed it of her,' said she, and went back to the house, mortified and grieved. She did not go to Mr. Raby again; but he happened to catch sight of her about an hour afterward, and called to her—'How is this, Jael? Have you let them go alone, because of a magple?' And he looked displeased.

'Nay, sir: she gave me the slip, while I went to speak to you for her good; and I call it a dirty trick, saving your presence. I told her I'd be back In a moment.'

'Oh, it is not her doing, you may be and I call it a cirty trick, saving your presence. I told her I'd be back in a moment.

'Oh, it is not her doing, you may be sure; it is the young genileman. He saw a chance to get ber alone, and of course he took it. I am not very well pleased; but I suppose she knows her own mind. It is to be a marriage no doubt. He smoothed it over, but was a little put out, and stalked away without another word; he had s-id enough to put Jael's bosom in a flutter, and open a bright prospect to her heart; Miss Carden once disposed of in marriage, what might she not hope? She now reflected, with houest: pride, that she had merited Henry's love by rare unseldshness. She had advised him loyally, had even co-operated with him as far as any poor girl, with her feelings for him, could do; and now Mr. Coventry was going to propose marriage to her rival, and she believed Miss Carden would say 'yes,' though she could not in her heart believe that even Miss Carden did not prefer the other. 'Ay, lad, 'said she, 'if I am to win thee, I'll be able to asy I won thee fair.'

These aweet thoughts and hopes soon removed her temporary anger, and nothing remained to dash the hopeful joy that warmed that large and loyal heart this afternoon, except a gentle misgiving that Mr. Coventry might make Grace a worse husband than she deserved. It was thus she read the magple, from three o'clock till six that afternoon.

When a man and a woman do anyernoon. When a man and a woman do anywhen a man and a woman the thing wrong, it is amusing to hear the judgments of other men and women thereupon. The men all blame the man, and the women all the woman.

man, and the women all the woman. That is judgment, is it not? But it some cases our pitchfarthing judgments must be either heads or taila; so Mr. Raby, who had oried heads, when a Mrs. Raby would have oried 'woman' was right; it sees Mr. Coventry, and not Miss Carden, who leaned over to George and whispered 'A sovereign to drive on without her! Make some excuse.'

propose that very day.

She made no movement whatever either to advance or to avoid the declaetter to avance or to avoid the decla-tion.

It is five miles from Raby Hall, through Cairnhope village, to the east-ern foot of Cairnhope; and while George rattles them over the hard and frosty road, I will tell the reader something about this young gentleman, who holds the winning cards.

Mr. Friderick Coventry was a man of the world. He becan the with soot

Mr. Friderick Coventry was a man of the world. He began life with good estate, and a large fund accumulated during his minority.

He spent all the money in learning the world at home and abroad; and, when it was all gone, he opened one eye. But as a man cannot see very well with a single orb, he exchanged rouge et noir, etc., for the share market, and, in other respects, lived as fast as ever, till he had mortgaged his estate rather heavily. Then he began to open both oyes.

heavily. Then he began to open both eyes.

Next, he fell in love with Grace Garden; and upon that he opened both eyes very wide, and wished very much he had his time to live over again.

Nevertheless, he was not much to be pitted. He had still an estate, which, with due ears, could pay off his encumberances; and he had gathered some valuable knowledge. He knew women better than most men, and he knew whist profoundly. Above all, he had acquired what Voltaire justify calls 'te grand art de plaire;' he had studied this art, as many women study it, and few men. Why, he even watched the countenance, and amoohed the rising bristles of those he wished to please, or did not wish to displease. This was the easier to him that he had no str convictions on any great topic. It is your plaguy convictions that make men subborn and disagreeble. A character of this kind is very susceptible, either of good or evil influences; and his attachment to Grace Carden was turning him the right way.

Add to this a good figure and a distinguished air, and you have some superficial idea of the gentleman toward whom Grace Carden found herself drawn by circumstances, and not un, joy and thrill which marks a genuine

willingly, though not with that sacred joy and thrill which marks a genuine passion.

They left George and the trap at the 'Colley Dog,' and ascended the mountain. There were no serious difficulties on this side; but still there were little occasional aspertites, that gave the lover an opportunity to offer his arm; and Mr. Coventry threw a graceful devotion even into this slight at of homage. He woed her with perfect moderation at first; it was not his business to alarm her st starting; he proceeded gradually; and, by the time they had reached the summit, he had fet his way, and had every reason to hope she would accept him.

At the summit the remarkable beauty of the view threw her into raptures, and interrupted the more interesting topic on which he was bent.

But the man of the world showed no impatience (I don't say he felt none); he answered all of Grace's questions, and told her what all the places were.

Bu, by-and-by, the simosphere thickened suddenly in that quarter, and he then told her gently he had something to show her on the other side of the nob.

He conducted her to a shed the shep-herds had erected, and seated her on a Pittsburgh Methodist Conference at The Annual Appointments.

The Pittsburgh "Methodist" Confer-ence, which had been in session at Fairmont some days since, adjourned Monday last. In the forenoon the fraternal messengers from the Maryland Conference took their leave, each one of the delegation making an appropriate and elequent address. The prospect of union between the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches was considered as hopeful indeed, and that the time would soon come when all the Conferences of non-Episcopal Methodism might meet in General Conference. The event was one of unusual interest and importance, and attracted very great attention from other churches and from the community at large. The Ray, Alexander Clark, of Pittsburgh, responded to the several addresses

New York Dry Goods Market.

From the Independent of Thursday.

There has been a very healthy trade in domestic dry goods through the whole of the last week. The demand has been steady, prices have been evenly maintained, and payments—particularly from the South, from which quarter most of the purchases at this eenson come—have been good. The purchases have not been heavy, as used to be the way in the olden time, since they can be made more frequently under the present system of transportation; but in the year's aggregate they amount to more. The 'cotton calamity,' which is the burden of English manufacturers, has not been so sayere. ty, which is the burden of English manufacturers, has not been so segretly felt on this side of the Atlantic, as we have a way of accepting the 'situation' more readily than they have on the other side. Great Britain cannot afford to have any disturbances among her laboring forces. But over here it does not matter. If there happens to be a short supply of colton, we make it up in something else. The cotton crop of the present will amount to three millions; and next year it may be one-third more, with a certainty of an increase equal to our necessities.

The cunning Yorkshire groom's eye twinkled at this, and he remained passive a minute or two; then said suddenly, with well acted ferror, 'I can't keep the pony waiting in the cold like this;' applied he whip and rattled off with such decision that Grace did not like to interfere, especially as George was known to be one of those hard masters, an old servant.

So, by this little ruse, Mr. Coventry had got her all to himself for the afternoon. And now she feit sure he would propose that very day.

Crease equal to our necessities.

BE BRAUTIFUL.—If you desire beauty you should use Hagan's Magnolia Balm.

It gives a soft, refined, satin-like taxture to the Complexton, removes Roughness, Radness, blotches, Sunburg, Tan, &c., and adds a tinge of Pearly Bloom to the plainest features. It brings the Bloom of Youth to the fading cheek, and changes the routic Country Girl into a Fashlonable City Country Girl into a Fashlonable City

> In the use of the Magnolia Balm lies the true secret of Beauty. No lady need complain of her Complexion who will invest 75 cents in this delightful article.
